POPI Compliance - confidence in overall company preparedness to deal with Protection of Personal Information legal requirements.

The Protection of Personal Information Act, 2013 (“the Act”) was enacted to promote the protection of personal information processed by companies and individuals (each a “Responsible Party”) and to establish minimum requirements for the processing of Personal Information.

The Act was signed into law on 19 November 2013, and on 11 April 2014 a proclamation declaring some parts of the Act effective, was issued.

These operative provisions essentially relate to certain administrative elements of the Act and the establishment of an Information Regulator.

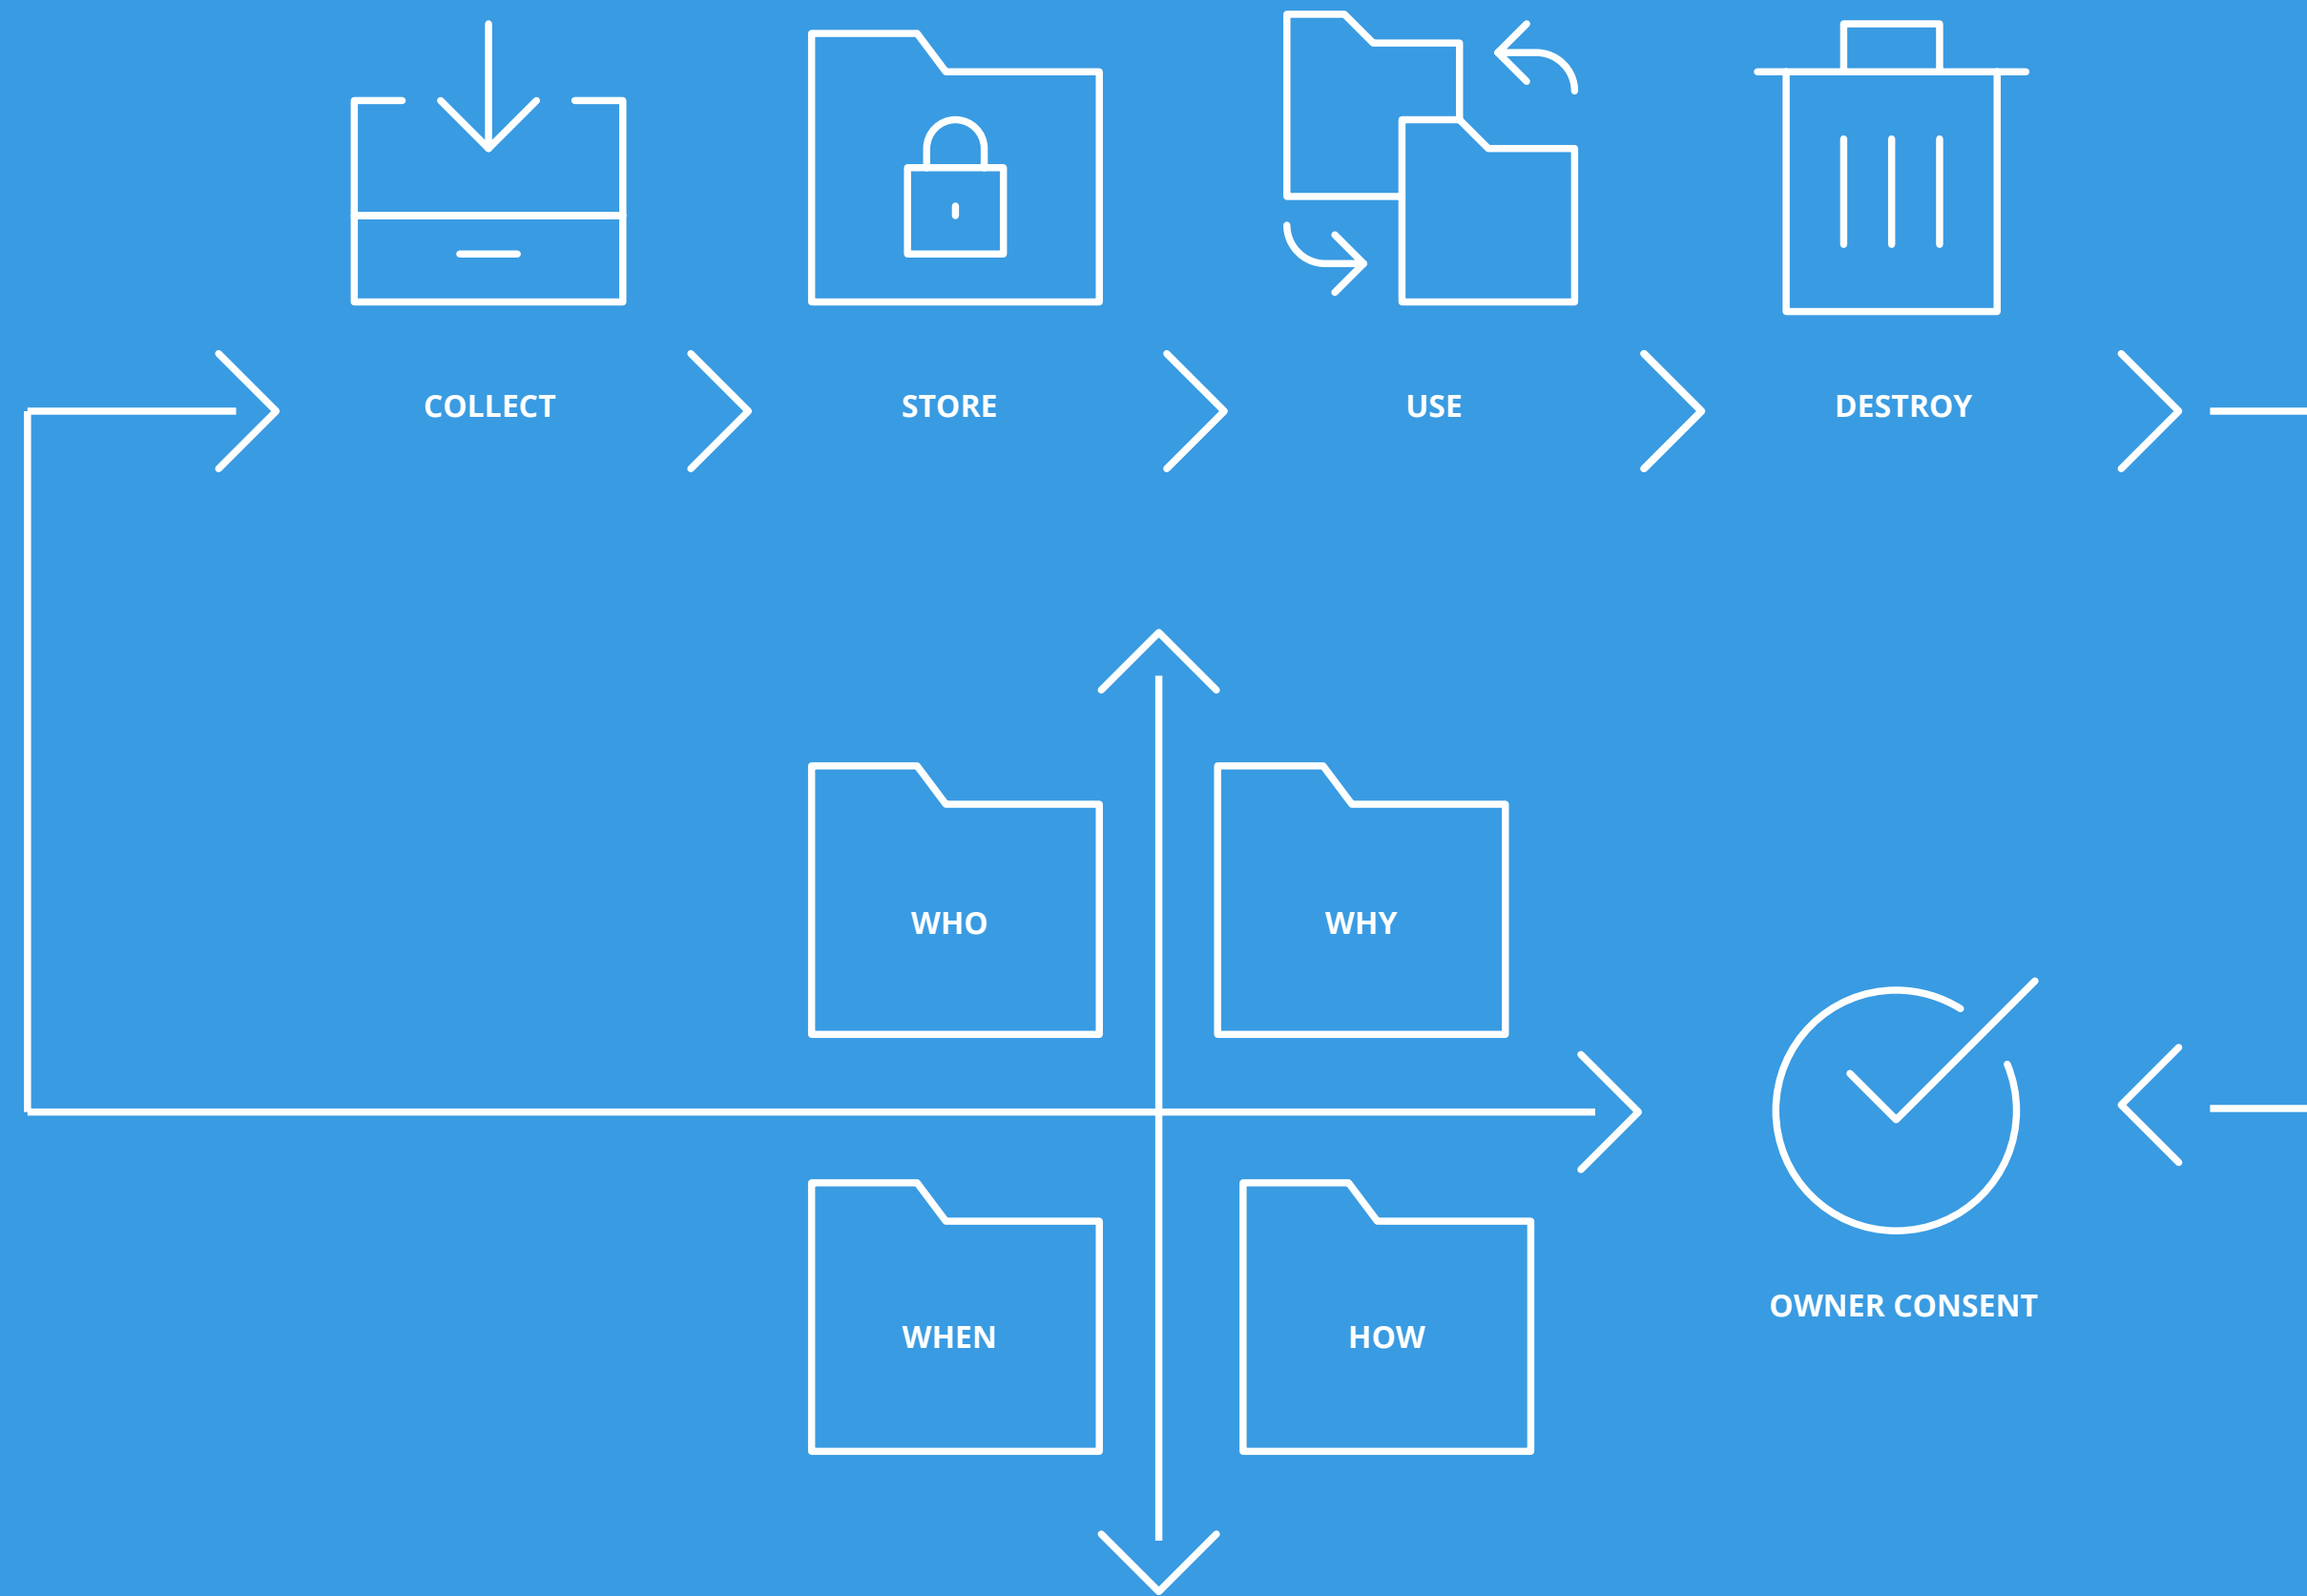

Once the remainder of the Act is made effective, data processors will be given 12 months’ grace to comply.

The Act therefore sets out the requirements to be complied with, and then creates a framework within which compliance is driven and enforced.

Companies that process Personal Information therefore need to be proactive in identifying the gaps in their current policies and procedures so that they are able to ensure compliance when the Act becomes effective.

In addition to the potential fines that could be levied on non-compliant companies, the public relations fall-out for a breach of data privacy legislation could have severe consequences.
